Use this section to add/change a Full Concentration

A full concentration is a single, major course of study that consists of approximately 13 courses from one area (in addition to required General Studies courses). For example, Accounting is a full concentration. A full concentration can also be an interdisciplinary course of study that consists of approximately 14 courses from two or more areas (in addition to required General Studies courses). Child and Family Studies is an example of a full interdisciplinary concentration.

Use this section to add/change a Co-Concentration

A co-concentration, also called a combined concentration, is a course of study that requires about seven designated courses from each of two different areas (in addition to required General Studies courses); certain co-concentrations must be combined with another co-concentration. For example, Digital Media is a co-concentration that must be combined with another co-concentration. Not all courses of study are co-concentrations; consult your academic advisor for assistance.
